Instructional Steps:

1. Introduce the lesson by asking students, “Have any of you had a memorable customer service experience—either positive or negative— when shopping at a store, visiting the doctor or dentist, or when interacting with a service provider?” Discuss examples from students (as well as your own).
2. Create a “T” chart and record characteristics of positive customer service vs. negative customer service, based on student experiences. What worker behaviors characterize a positive experience for customers or clients?
3. Explain to students that no matter what field they are considering entering—from health care to retail; from

IT to automotive repair—customer service is a vital component of employee success. Tell students that today they will be researching companies known for excellent customer service to determine what mindsets and behaviors factor into successful customer service.

4. Divide students into research groups. Assign each group a company known for excellent customer service to research. Examples that you may want to use include Disney, Wegmans, Zappos, The Apple Store, and The Ritz-Carlton (but feel free to add other companies known for excellent customer service). Ask students to use Handout #1: Excellence in Customer Service to record their findings. Discuss appropriate keyword searches to ensure that students get the best results via the Internet.
5. Allow time for research and group work. Circulate among students and offer assistance as needed.
6. Hold class discussion to share research findings. Ask each group to present their findings about great customer service. Create a list of elements required for excellent customer service.
7. Reflect in writing. Based on the day's activity, ask students to reflect in writing on the following journal prompt:
Why do you think customer service is important to the success of a business? What outcomes do businesses experience when they make customer service a priority? What outcomes may companies experience when customer service is not a priority?

Formative Assessment:

- Assess student understanding and participation as demonstrated in the class and small group discussions.
- Evaluate student understanding of concepts within the lesson as demonstrated by the findings recorded on Handout #1: Excellence in Customer Service.
- Evaluate student presentations of research.

Options for Adaptation/Differentiation:

- To offer student scaffolding for this activity, research just one company together, completing Handout #1: Excellence in Customer Service as a whole class.
- To extend this activity and provide further enrichment, ask students to use their notes to create a PowerPoint presentation about their chosen company. What philosophies and behaviors are behind the company's success when it comes to customer service?

Suggestions for Follow-up:

- Invite a manager or business owner to discuss the importance of good customer service.
- Many elements of good customer service (e.g., listening skills, conflict-resolution skills, resourcefulness) are skills that align with overall workplace readiness, as well as with success in the classroom. Ask students to create a bulletin board of "tips for success" that incorporate some examples from student research.
